 viruses. The role of gender in crisis and conflict settings is significant, as conflicts tend to affect women disproportionately, often in ways that reinforce gender inequalities. Understanding the role of women in peace processes is therefore crucial for effective conflict resolution and sustainable peace. The article discusses the challenges faced by women in peace processes and highlights the importance of their active participation. The research project, titled "Women's Inclusion and Participation in Peace Processes," has been carried out in various countries, including Afghanistan, Burundi, Libya, Myanmar, Philippines, Colombia, and others. The project has been supported by international organizations and has led to the development of strategies for increasing women's representation and participation in decision-making processes. The project's findings emphasize the need for inclusive approaches that recognize the unique challenges faced by women in conflict settings.
