Peace Process Support

Inclusion and State

In recent years, the United Nations Entity for Gender Equality and Women's Empowerment (UNWOMEN) and the Women's Peace and Development Network (WPDN) have focused on strengthening women's participation in peace processes and promoting gender equality in conflict zones. They have supported various initiatives, including training programs and research projects, to enhance women's inclusion and influence in peace negotiations.

The Building Peace Partnerships (BPP) initiative is one such project that has successfully involved women's groups from different nationalities and provided inputs to various parties. Through these efforts, BPP has contributed to the development of more gender-sensitive conflict resolution strategies.

In addition, the Women Mediators Network (WMN) has also played a crucial role in empowering women as mediators in conflict resolution. By creating platforms for women to voice their perspectives and influence decision-making, the WMN has helped to broaden political and civil society participation and contribute to more inclusive peace processes.

Furthermore, various research institutions, NGOs, and think-tanks have contributed to advancing knowledge on women's participation in peace processes. This has resulted in a greater understanding of the challenges facing women and the potential for gender-sensitive solutions.

In conclusion, the efforts of organizations such as UNWOMEN, WPDN, BPP, andWMN, among others, have led to increased women's inclusion and influence in peace processes. These initiatives demonstrate the importance of gender equality in conflict resolution and the potential for more inclusive and sustainable peace processes.
